Among the many productivity-encouraging spreadsheet projects are creating a mailing list, which exposes Excel's use as a Word resource, and developing a work application that emphasizes the program's data validation features. Discover other features using Excel for budgeting and for tracking informative articles. Consider this scenario: You wrote a form letter that you want to customize before sending it to employers or potential customers. You must customize the offer and close the letter. Excel helps with this task by providing separate columns for first and last name, and recipient addresses. First, create the First Name, Last Name, and Address headings in separate, adjacent Excel columns. Then, enter the data for each header. After you add the field names to a Word document, you can link to Excel scripture data by using the Word Mail Merge command. To create an app from work or a questionnaire, enter the field's guidelines and labels in one spreadsheet column and direct candidates to enter their responses in an adjacent column. Use Excel data validation in input cells to ensure the correct type of response for each field. For example, to ensure that the Work Application Phone Number field has only integers, click the Integer item from the Allow control in the Data Validation dialog box. Use the form controls on the Excel Developer tab to make it easy to enter for specific input types. For yes or no questions, for example, insert a check box control on the form. To help you keep track of your monthly expenses, list the name and category of each expense in one spreadsheet column and the dollar amount of spending in an adjacent column. For example, enter car insurance, groceries, and other expenses in a column labeled Expense Category. To the right of this column, enter the amount spent last month in the appropriate category. When the month ends, use the Insert Pie button to create a pie chart showing the largest expenses. Use Excel to help you remember interesting articles from the Internet and other media. Use one spreadsheet column to list article headings, and another column to list URLs or magazine names for those headings. Other columns may include subject names, such as Leisure or Create a Tags column to contain keywords, making it easy to find articles. For example, add the Food and Diet tags to an article about the nutritional value of garlic. You may forget the article a few weeks after reading it, but by using the Excel Filter command to display only those articles with the Food tag, you'll notice a reference to the garlic article.
